Research Interests

The scientific activity of Marco Porta is mainly focused on several aspects of Eye Tracking, Vision-Based Interfaces, Visual Communication, and Human-Computer Interaction in general, and can be summarized by the macro subjects listed below.

Eye Tracking

Eye Tracking is the ability of some devices to track the user's gaze direction and measure distinguishing eye features. Applications of this technology range from the support to disabled people to the integration with ordinary input devices (such as keyboard and mouse). Moreover, data obtained from the recording of eye movements are very useful for usability studies and biometric applications. The research activity of Marco Porta in the field of Eye Tracking has developed in the following areas:

(1) Implementation of gaze-based interfaces. In the context of the integration of eye communication with ordinary user interfaces (articles [J4][C1][C9][C12][C13][C17][B2][B3][B4] in the following list of publications), pointing errors have been faced by means of both automatic and "manual" techniques [B5][C21]. As a support to disabled users, some solutions have been proposed for text entry [J2][J13][C42], web surfing [C2][C35], playing music [C5], e-learning [J21], and the use of ordinary "windows-based" operating environments [J25][B9][C9][C31][C32][C33][C36].

(2) User behavior analysis in the context of e-learning and "intelligent" e-learning systems. The research carried out has considered the evaluation of learning (especially in multiple-choice tests [C20][C25]), the analysis of the evolution of eye parameters in response to different kinds of stimuli [J24][J26][C26], and the implementation of e-learning platforms able to monitor and guide the learning process by detecting potential situations in which the user is not correctly understanding something, is experiencing cognitive stress, or is getting tired [C7][C8][C19][C39][C41][C45].

(3) Gaze-based soft biometrics. The user's "eye behavior" while freely observing specific kinds of stimuli (e.g., face pictures) can be exploited for biometric purposes in both recognition and authentication processes [J1][J14][C3][C4][C18][C22][C24][B1]. In addition, it can be used for forensic applications [J8] and for age and gender estimation [J5][J12][C16].

(4) Information presentation analysis for different kinds of interfaces, such as image browsing [J10] and online newspapers [J18][J19][C23][C38].

(5) Semi-automation of usability evaluation of user interfaces, through a simplified analysis of quantitative test results [C29].

(6) Study of eye behavior in different contexts, such as reading [B6], captioning [J20][C37], face recognition [J16], car driving [C8], and evaluation of historical violins [J6].

Vision-Based perceptive Interfaces

Although the WIMP interaction paradigm (based on Windows, Icons, Menus, and Pointing devices) has been very useful for providing a common face to computing, new interaction options are now possible in the direction of "naturalness". Perceptive interfaces are interfaces able to acquire, by means of proper sensors, information about the user and the surrounding environment. In particular, Vision-Based perceptive Interfaces (VBIs) employ video cameras to implement machine vision [J29]. In addition, or as alternatives, more sophisticated devices can be exploited, such as ToF (Time of Flight) video cameras or the more recent Microsoft Kinect sensor (also used in biometric applications [J7][C14]).

Marco Porta has considered the two main kinds of interaction identifiable for VBIs (depending on the active or passive role played by the user), namely explicit and implicit communication [J29]. While in explicit communication users are fully aware that their actions (e.g., gestures [J11][J15][C27][C28][C43][C48]) will be interpreted in a certain way by the computer, in implicit communication users are indirectly “observed” to obtain information on what they are doing or what is happening in the nearby environment; or, also, to get information about their “emotional states”, through the recognition of facial expressions and body movements [J29][C30][C34][C46]. Of course, interfaces based on Eye Tracking are a particular case of perceptive interfaces.

Visual systems for browsing large collections of images

Within the so-called Information Visualization field, the subclass of Information Presentation is of great interest because of its many application possibilities. The purpose of Information Presentation is to provide the user with a “view” of one or more kinds of elements that are both global and detailed at the same time.

Marco Porta has considered the problem of browsing large numbers of images. The assumption is that it is very often necessary to examine large collections of pictures to find something, without, however, knowing exactly what (in such cases, neither manually indexed query systems nor “intelligent” databases, automatically searchable based on specific graphic features, can be employed). Different image presentation techniques have been created and tested, most of which based on the RSVP (Rapid Serial Visual Presentation) paradigm [J10][J22][C40][C47][C50].

Visual languages

Unlike textual languages, visual languages can take advantage of the two-dimensional or three-dimensional space. Applied to computer programming, for example, visual languages can be used to create programs that, syntactically and semantically, depend on graphic elements and their spatial arrangement.

Specifically, Marco Porta has been mainly concerned with the class of Data-Flow languages (graph structures where nodes represent functions and data flow through arcs) [J31][J32][C53][C57][C59][C60][C61][C62][C63][C64][T1] and with languages for querying relational databases [C44][C49].

E-Learning

Constant technological advances offer increasingly flexible training solutions, allowing novel forms of teaching and learning to be devised [C52]. If the quality of content is essential for any kind of teaching [J9][J17][C11][R1], equally important is, in the case of e-learning [C15], the quality of interaction, unfortunately often disregarded. The research of Marco Porta in the field of e-learning has focused on the improvement of interaction, obtained mainly by means of perceptive interfaces. Especially, implicit communication can be particularly effective because it can detect potentially critical “cognitive states”, both through eye parameters [J3][C10][C19][C39][C41][C45] and by means of the analysis of face expressions and user behavior [J26][J27].

Graphical user interfaces, usability, and accessibility

Almost always, using a computer means interacting with visual formalisms. However, some visual systems may lead to interaction models which are hard to control. The research of Marco Porta in this area has focused on the development of new interaction paradigms for visual interfaces (with special attention to the Web) [J32][B7][B10][C51][C54][C58][I1][N2][N3], as well as on the identification of usability criteria for their effective design [B8][N1]. Moreover, the interaction with mobile robots [J33] and advanced web query systems has been considered [B10], also in the context of European projects [B7].

Computer Vision

Computer Vision allows machines to exploit cameras to acquire information about the environment in which they operate. Typical uses range from industrial systems to robotics and medical appliances, with recent applications to the field of Human-Computer Interaction.

Marco Porta has worked on the development of computer vision techniques for the assessment of distances in monocular vision [B12][C56], vanishing point detection in perspective images [C55], autonomous navigation of vehicles [J28][J30], and multi-resolution representations of images [J23][B11]. In Vision-Based perceptive Interfaces, computer vision problems are related to the observation of users, their actions, and the environment surrounding them.
